

LOUISIANA

America's energy security is currently being threatened by geopolitical turmoil that is challenging our energy industry. Now more than ever, it is crucial we protect our nation's energy security by ensuring that oil and gas exploration and production in the Gulf of Mexico can continue unabated, in a growth environment.

In 2018, the Gulf of Mexico produced 16% of our nation's total crude oil and 3% of our natural gas, both of which fuel the homes, businesses, and lives of Americans. Besides those crucial functions, Gulf-produced energy provides well-paying jobs for thousands of Louisianans.

As America faces geopolitical and economic uncertainty, the COVID-19 crisis simultaneously is threatening lives and further harm to our economy. At the beginning of April, a record 6.6 million Americans filed for unemployment in one week. When we are able to recover from this crisis, many will be looking for jobs and struggling to keep food on their tables.

However, Gulf exploration and production can create jobs and mitigate the economic damage in several important ways.

One study found that expanding access in the Gulf of Mexico could help provide Louisianans with nearly 24,000 jobs and an additional $2.2 billion in Gross Domestic Product. It could also add more than $1.4 billion in funding for coastal projects. These new jobs and resources could become critical to Louisiana as we look toward building a path to recovery to lift us out of the twin crises of COVID-19 and the oil price war.

73%

Louisianans who support expanded oil and gas exploration and production

In a recent poll, 73% of Louisianans supported expanded oil and gas exploration and production, while 60% would oppose efforts to limit it.

Revenue sharing under the Gulf of Mexico Energy Security Act also brings in additional funding to Louisiana and the Gulf Coast, however these funds are capped at $375 million for the four participating states to share. Removing the cap would help Louisiana receive more money for coastal projects.

The Department of the Interior recently announced that Louisiana would receive almost $156 million to be spent on coastal projects, including hurricane protection. The jobs that are created with that additional funding will put Louisianans to work.

It is critically important to keep Louisiana and America's economy moving forward by leaving every energy option on the table.

$156 MILLION

The amount DOI announced Louisiana would receive to be spent on coastal projects, including hurricane protection.